In addition to padding out the time you have in the day, along with your bank account, intermittent fasting is also known to allow those who practice it to live longer, healthier lives. Studies show that spending time in a fasting state cause your body to expend less energy on processing food, energy which is then spent on reinforcing core survival process in much the way that it does if you are starving. While your body might react to them in the same way, starving and fasting affect the body in dramatically different ways, however, which means you end up with a net positive result.
